President Barack Obama
President of the United States

Dear President Obama:

I am a sixth grade student at the United States International School. Over the year my class and I have been studying the UN Millennium Development Goals, which are currently trying to be achieved all over the world by people such as Ban Ki Moon. My class and I were very inspired by the millennium goals. So inspired, in fact that we decided to do individual research on issues all over the world that we would like to remediate. I chose air pollution.

Air pollution is one of the most serious problems in the world and the single most deadly type of pollution. Often people overlook air pollution and assume there are bigger and more important things to solve in the world like hunger or poverty, but these people are wrong. Over 50,000 people die from air pollution in New York City alone. People also think that air pollution is only relevant in places such as China or some parts of Africa. But, once again, this is wrong. Air pollution happens all over the world including New York City and almost every single state in America.

I am writing you this letter because I would like a person with as much power as you to help me create awareness about this issue in order to help solve it. I made an executive report on air pollution that I highly recommend you read if you would like to have some sort of an idea what I am trying to do to help solve this problem. If you do not wish to read the report for whatever reason, you can always support of donate to an online website that has the same goal as me.

I appreciate you taking the time to read my letter and I will also try to convince other people to help me solve this problem so that we have a better chance of doing so. Once again I encourage you to read my executive report and hope that you consider trying to help make a change! Please respond to me by email, as I will be moving. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Valentino Giobbi
